John Keller is a seasoned trial and appellate lawyer and trusted counselor to companies, executives, and public officials. Drawing on nearly 20 years of government experience, most recently as the Acting Chief of DOJ's Public Integrity Section (PIN), John helps clients navigate high-stakes government investigations, congressional inquiries, white-collar prosecutions, and complex enforcement matters.

John spent more than fifteen years at the Department of Justice, including over a decade at PIN where he served for five years as Principal Deputy and Acting Chief of the Section. He led hundreds of investigations and prosecutions involving criminal abuses of the public trust by federal, state, and local public officials, companies, and corporate officers engaged in procurement, healthcare, securities, and honest services fraud, bribery, money laundering, campaign finance, ballot fraud, national security, and tax offenses. John has tried 16 federal cases, both as a prosecutor and defense counsel, handled 20 appeals, and supervised dozens of additional trials and hundreds of grand jury investigations nationwide.

In addition to his active practice, John teaches a constitutional law course at Georgetown University Law Center and was an instructor at DOJ's National Advocacy Center on Developments in Fraud, Public Corruption, and Election Law; Jury Instructions; and Investigative Techniques. He is a frequent speaker on issues of national security and election law, and has appeared on NPR, CNN, NBC, and the Lawfare Institute.

Experience
